

GS Yuasa Battery: Employee's Review

Morgan Terrance Dark

November 2019

1 Introduction

Hello, My name is Morgan Dark. I am a full time employee at GS Yuasa Battery. I currently work as a Burner. My role requires me to meet targets on a daily basis. I started working for the company in July of 2019, it is currently November and I have just passed my probationary period. I have hit my target a few times although it is a really tough target to hit. You are expected to hit 160 batteries each shift, which does not sound so bad when you are on a eight hour shift but when you factor in breaks and the batteries you have to go down and repair it becomes very difficult.

While trying to hit your target, (Once you are past the quality check cut up stage) the things that will trip you up will be the small but minor things at first. When I say small things I am talking about running out of ICC'S or Posts. This can be quite a big annoyance, especially when you are only like 15 batteries off of target.

2 Conclusion

So, After working in this factory for three and a half months now, it begs the question is the work worth it? Short answer, Yes. In order for me to come to that conclusion was a series of hard and difficult questions. Like at the moment I currently do not drive and rely on lifts in order to get to work, on days this can be quite difficult. I am currently learning to drive but may not pass for another few months. So I get lifts there and back daily I will do my eight hour shift with 45min worth of breaks. Supervisors, no matter how old and broken your machine is they will still expect you to reach that number and have time to complete all of your repairs. It can be hard on times to be able to hit your target, especially if you are having a bad day.

3 Summary

As stated previously in this review I would say working in Yuasa is worth it, especially when you consider the promotion opportunities. Most of the people working in the factory have been there for a good couple of years, so don't get me wrong like in any job there is always competition for a promotion. Over all not the worst place to work given the wage.
